Course Description
This seminar will focus on works written for the piano by composers active between 1800 and the present. In-depth and focused research and discussion will aid the participants in exploring how specific composers used a variety of devices and influences to build up their individual styles. These will include forms and devices from earlier times (e.g. the baroque), forms and stylistic devices from other genres (e.g. opera), and folk and popular music. Examination of the ways in which different composers have worked with these materials will help both to differentiate the piano styles of individual composers and also make clear long-term trends in the development of piano literature. Throughout the seminar, discussion will constantly be tempered by the outlook of the participants as performers.
Course Evaluation

1) Article presentations (2) 30% (15%+15%)
Each participant will be expected to give two oral reviews of articles chosen by the instructor. The articles, provided by the instructor, will be relevant to the topics being discussed in class. The reviews should provide a synopsis of the contents of the article under discussion and a critical analysis of those contents. Clarity of style and presentation will also be considered in the presenter’s assessment. The presentation will be followed by a class discussion. Presenters will then prepare a brief (5–6 pages) written version of their presentations, taking into consideration the in-class discussion. Written assignments must be submitted to the instructor within one week of the oral presentation.

2) In-class topic presentations - 30%
Each participant will be required to deliver one 30-minute in-class presentations. The topics for the presentations will be selected by the instructor in consultation with each participant and will be related to topics being discussed concurrently in the seminar. This presentation should be considered preparatory to the final paper.

3) Final Paper - 40%
The final paper will be a research paper approximately 15-20pgs in length. The topic for the final paper should be the same as the topic for the final in-class presentation. The paper should be on a topic related to but not bound by the issues discussed in class and approved by the instructor. Whatever the topic decided on, participants may wish to use this paper as preparatory to their degree monograph.

Course Calendar
The seminar will be held on Thursdays and Fridays throughout the winter term from Jan. 10th to April 4th.
